Third Subject: Text

Man is characterized by being conscious, and he is able to think. This means – what he is and how he could be – he exists for himself (i.e. he is conscious). Things in nature do not exist except immediately and in one way, whereas man, because he is a spirit, he has a dual existence: he exists as other things in nature form one part, and he exists for himself from another part; he contemplates, he realizes himself and he thinks, and he is not a thinking spirit except through this activity that constitutes his existence for himself.

This consciousness of the self is acquired in two ways: first, theoretically, as he should refer to himself in order to be aware of all his internal inclinations; in general he contemplates...

Second, in a practical way, man constitutes himself through his practical activities... This need to modify the external world is already imprinted in the first drives of the child; a little child who throws pebbles in a stream, he admires the circles that form on the surface of the water; he actually admires a scene that is the benefit of his personal activity.
